How does account-based display advertising work?

What is Account-based Marketing (ABM)?

ABM means individual marketing for interested parties. Quality and personalisation instead of quantity and mass communication.

What is Display Advertising?

Display advertising refers to advertisements – usually graphics with text, in digital media, for example on websites.

Account-based Display Advertising („ABD“)

Combines the advantages of both approaches: The reach of display advertising and the precision of account-based marketing. This is a new approach in the German market.

Here's how it works:

- 1 You send us a Target Account List (TAL) of companies you want to reach.
- 2 heise surveys the potential of the local loop on the basis of a free analysis.
- 3 Your ads will only be displayed to those companies that are relevant to you as a company. A maximum value per company ensures a broad display (frequency capping).
- 4 You receive a reporting of the ad performance.

These are the major advantages

Wide reach in a high value editorial environment:

You advertise on heise.de, the leading IT online magazine where decision-makers from companies of all sizes get their information on current tech topics. Being noticed here increases the awareness and reputation of your brand.

Precise targeting:

You reach exactly the companies and the buying centre you want to attract. Address your target group precisely in wording and visual language. Instead of generic statements, you can come up with the argumentation that suits your target customers best.

Highest efficiency:

You use your marketing budget particularly efficiently by avoiding wastage. Reach only the companies you really want to reach with your message.

Consider the customer journey:

Target companies that you would like to draw attention to or draw attention to new products in the environment of your existing customers.
